

Master First Aid Training

- First aid master trainers teach others how to respond to emergencies and help the injured or sick before emergency medical service arrives.
- They lead first aid instructor training programs to approve and certify new instructors. Requirements for becoming a first aid master trainer vary by certifying board, but typically include coursework, passing an examination and demonstrating skills.
- There are no education requirements to become a first aid trainer or instructor. While prior nursing and medical training can be helpful, it is not a prerequisite. Teaching experience is also advantageous but not required. First aid trainer programs are designed to provide students with all the skills and information they need to become a successful first aid trainer, regardless of their background.
